KEY DEVELOPMENTS – INTERNATIONAL

British retail sales grew more strongly than expected in June and returned almost to their pre-lockdown level as non-essential stores in England reopened to the public in the middle of the month. Retail sales in June grew by 13.9% from May, above the average 8% growth forecasted. The level of sales last month was down by only a marginal 0.6% compared with February, before the coronavirus lockdown. Excluding fuel sales, which have been depressed by less commuting and other travel, the level of sales was 2.4% higher than in February. Britain's economy shrank by more than a quarter in March and April, according to official figures, and only recovered slightly in May when there was a limited relaxation of lockdown rules imposed on March 23 to slow the spread of COVID-19. The Bank of England's chief economist, Andy Haldane, has pointed to private-sector data suggesting a rapid, V-shaped recovery with the economy growing by around 1% a week, though many of his colleagues are doubtful about the prospects of a sustained recovery. The British Retail Consortium said earlier this month that spending among its members - typically large high-street chains - was 3.4% higher this June than last year.

Britain and the European Union clashed over the chances of securing a free trade agreement, with Brussels deeming it "unlikely" but London holding out hope one could be reached in September. Since Britain left the bloc in January, talks on the trade agreement and other future ties have all but stalled, with each side accusing the other of failing to compromise before a transition period runs out at the end of this year. Those accusations grew louder after the latest round ended, with the EU's negotiator Michel Barnier saying London had shown no willingness to break the deadlock and his British counterpart David Frost describing the bloc's proposals as failing to meet the government's demand to be treated as an independent country. But both sides agreed on one thing: there had been no movement on the main stumbling blocks to a deal on fair competition guarantees - or the so-called level playing field - or on fisheries. Without a deal to govern future trade flows, some companies fear costly disruption and confusion at the border from next year, which would hit at a time when many are already struggling with the impact of the coronavirus crisis.

Big data is providing some surprising results for the Bank of Japan and helping ease concerns about pressure on the economy during the coronavirus pandemic, which could influence the way the BOJ manages the world's most radical monetary stimulus. By tapping data provided by Google showing people's movement via mobile phones, the BOJ found that households' discretionary spending rebounded faster and more vividly in Japan than in other countries after lockdown steps were lifted in May. Other big data also showed a marked rebound in durable goods sales such as personal computers, which offset some of the weakness in spending on services including leisure, eating-out and travel. The revelation helped convince BOJ policymakers to conclude the economy has past the worst and did not need immediate, additional monetary support. "We expect the economy to recover gradually and steadily,"

U.S. retail sales increased more than expected in June, but the budding economic recovery is being threatened by a resurgence in new Covid-19 infections and high unemployment. The Commerce Department said on Thursday retail sales rose 7.5% last month. That was on top of the 18.2% jump in May, which was the biggest gain since the government started tracking the series in 1992. Economists polled by Reuters had forecast retail sales advancing 5% in June. Retail sales have rebounded as businesses resumed operations after being shuttered in mid-March in an effort to slow the spread of the coronavirus. But new cases of the respiratory illness have exploded, especially in the densely populated South and West, forcing some authorities in these regions to either close businesses again or pause reopenings. The uncertainty sparked by the spiraling Covid-19 cases is chipping at the recovery, which started in May, and could worsen already astoundingly high unemployment. The economy had already slipped into recession in February, before the coronavirus-related shutdowns began in the United States.

U.S. home sales increased by the most on record in June, boosted by historically low mortgage rates, but the outlook for the housing market is being clouded by low inventory and high unemployment amid the COVID-19 pandemic. The report from the National Association of Realtors, which also showed house prices rising to an all-time high last month, confirmed a shift toward bigger homes and properties away from urban centers as companies allow employees flexibility to work from home because of the coronavirus. The upbeat housing market news was overshadowed by a relentless surge in new COVID-19 infections, which has prompted some authorities in the hard hit South and West regions to either shut down businesses again or pause reopenings, threatening the economy's recovery from the COVID-19 slump. Existing home sales jumped 20.7% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 4.72 million units last month.
